

Breaking Dawn is when the page of yesterday ends and turns to reveal of the page of today.

The rotation of the earth is a natural example of a narrative. Nature narrates the transition of the passing of time, when one day ends and another begins.

We must become intentional to develop our Personal Narrative. Your Personal Narrative communicates:

Where you are,

who you are with, and what you do from day to day.

Every personal narrative has a moral to the story that should provide morale to the listener.

Respond to the following questions:

Q: What is the moral of my personal narrative?

Q: How has it created morale among others around me?

How do you know when you need to break with dawn? How do you know when you are in the midst of a run-on sentence?

When where you are ain't who you are.

How do you know when you are where you shouldn't be?

-When you get lost in the same places you can always be found.

Q: What is an example of a time that I felt lost in a familiar place?

When who you are with ain't who you are.

-When who is around us predicts our personal narrative instead of us. When you do things that you regret with them what you wouldn't do alone.

Q: When was a time in which I participated in behavior that wasn't me to keep the peace with who I was with?

When what you do isn't who you are.

-When you perpetually don't know what happened.

Q: When was a time in which I had a relationship break down and I'm not sure what happened?
